Machine Guns.

The Browning Machine Gun, heavy, was used by the three machine gun companies participating in the operation. However, on account of the fog, targets could not be picked up, and the machine guns did little firing.

The machine gunners did excellent work in pushing their pieces forward, under heavy fire, practically as fast as the advance of the infantry units. The result was that the machine guns were always in a position to fire had opportunity presented a target. The dense fog hovered over the battlefield all the morning, until shortly after the suspension of hostilities, and made it impossible to get any great effects out of the machine guns.

37 mm. Guns.

The fog likewise prevented free use of the 37 mm. gun. At no time during the action was the enemy visible, and it was impossible, simply from the sound of his machine gun fire, to locate
